"I ain't never let my lady pass on, Mebbe dis trip I fin' de place."
"I'm sorry—becuz you—well, I'm a selfish sort of cuss—and"—I nerved pulled off blushing, with a strong man's display of shame at his own emotion. "I owe all my happiness to you, old man. I can't thank you—neither of us can. We shall never live long enough for that. But you mustn't go without knowing that I feel more than I'll ever have words to say."

He was making it very hard for the Frenchman, whose heart was aching already with a dull, unending pain. And then, as if he were not trying sufficiently, the girl herself came flying in. "What's this I hear?" she cried. "Al-luna tells me"—She saw the telltale pile on the counter, and her face grew white. "Then it's true? Oh, Poleon!" He smiled and spoke cheerily. "Yes, I been tinkin' 'bout dis trip long tam."
"It's the wanderlust," murmured Burrell to himself. "He'll never rest."
"What a child you are!" cried Necla, half angrily. "Can't you conquer that roving spirit and settle down like a man?" She laid her hand on his arm appealingly. "Haven't I told you there isn't any 'far country'?"

He laughed aloud, for all the world as if the sun were bright and the fret for adventure were still keen in him, then, picking up his bundle, said: "There's no use argue wit' Canayan man. Mebbe some day I come paddle back roun' de ben' down yonder an' you hear me singin' dose chanson. But now de day she's too fine, de river she's laugh too loud, an' de birds she's sing too purty for Frenchman to stop on shore. Ba gosh, I'm glad!" He began to hum, and they heard him singing all the way down to the river bank as if the spirit of youth and hope and gladness were not dead within him.

"Chante, rossignol, chante!"
"Toi qui a le coeur gai!"
"Tu as le coeur a rire!"
"Mal j'f'ait a pleurer!"
"Il y a longtemps que j'f'aime!"
"Jamais je ne t'oublierai!"
("Sing, little bird; oh, sing away. You with the voice so light and gay! Yours is a heart that laughter cheers. Mine is a heart that's full of tears. Long have I loved; I love her yet. Leave her I can, but not forget.")

A moment later they heard him exulting with some one at the water's edge, and then a child's treble rose on high.

"No, no! I'm goin', too. I'm goin', too—o-o-o!"

"Hey! John Gale!" called Poleon. "Come 'ere! Ba gosh, you better hurry too! I can't hol' dis fellow long!"
When they appeared on the bank above him, he continued, "Look 'ere w'at I fin' on my battens," and held up the wriggling form of Johnny Gale. "He's stow hisself away under dem blanket. Saure! He's bad feller, dis man—don't pay for hees ticket at all; he's reg'lar toff mug!"

It took the efforts of Necla and the trader combined to tear the lad from the Frenchman, and even then the foul deed was accomplished only at the cost of such wild acclamations and evidence of undying sorrow that little Molly came hurrying from the house, her round face stained and tearful, her mouth an inverted crescent. She had gone to the lane puppy for comfort and now strangled him absentmindedly in her arms, clutching him to her breast so tightly that his tongue lolled out and his three legs protruded stiffly, pawing an aimless pantomime. When Johnny found that no hope remained he quelled his demonstrations of emotion and, as belittled a stout hearted gentleman of the woods, bore a final present to his friend. He took his little air gun and gave it into Poleon's hands against that black night when the bears would come, and no man ever made a greater sacrifice. Doret picked him up by the elbows and kissed him again and again, then set him down gently, at which Molly scrambled forward and without word or presentation speech gave him her heart's first treasure. She held out the three-legged puppy, for a gun and a dog should ever go together; then, being of the womankind aforesaid, she began to cry as she kissed her pet goodby on its cold, wet nose.

"Wat's dis?" said Poleon, and his voice quavered, for these childish fingers tore at his heartstrings terribly.
"He's a very brave doggie," said the little girl. "He will never de bears away!" And then she became dissolved in tears at the anguish her offering cost her.

The time had come for the last good-bye—that awkward moment when human hearts are full and spoken words are empty. Burrell gripped the Frenchman's hand. He was grateful, but he did not know.

"Good luck and better hunting," he said, "a heavy purse and a light heart for you always, Poleon. I have learned to love you."
"I want you to be good husband, n'est-ce?" Daret de bes' ting I can wish for you."
Gale spoke to him in patois, and all he said was:

"May you not forget, my son."
They did not look into each other's eyes. There was no need. The old man stooped and, holding both his children by the hand, walked slowly toward the house.

"His tam! I'll fin' it for sure," smiled Poleon to Necla.

Her eyes were shining through the tears, and she whispered fervently: "I hope so, brother. God love you—always."

It was grief at losing a playmate, a dear and well-beloved companion. He knew it well, and he was glad now that he had never said a word of love to her. It added to his pain, but it lightened here, and it had been his wish. He gazed on her for a long moment, taking in that blessed image which would ever live with him.

"Goodby, ITT!" he said, then dropped her hand and entered his canoe. With one great stroke he gave it out and into the flood, then heaved away toward the hills and echoes of the distant hills, where the clouds were calling to him. He turned for one last look and then his public high; then, fearing lest they might see the tears that came at last unbidden, he began to sing:

"Chante, rossignol, chante!"
"Toi qui a le coeur gai!"
"Tu as le coeur a rire!"
"Mal j'f'ait a pleurer!"
"Il y a longtemps que j'f'aime!"
"Jamais je ne t'oublierai!"

He sang long and lustily, keeping time to the dip of his flashing paddle and defying his bursting heart. After all, was he not a voyager and life but a song and a tear and then a dream or two?

"I wish I might have known him better," sighed Meade Burrell as he watched the receding form of the boatman.

"You would have loved him as we do," said Necla, "and you would have missed him as we will."
"I hope some time he will be happy."
"As happy as you, my soldier?"
"Yes, but that he can never be," said her husband, "for no man could love as I love you."

"Yours is a heart that laughter cheers. Mine is a heart that's full of tears. Long have I loved; I love her yet. Leave her I can, but not forget," came the voice of the singer far down the stream.

And thus Poleon of the great heart went away.

THE END.

THE SAN FRANCISCO THEATRE.

This latest open-air theatre with the largest screen in town, is playing to very good business. The films are excellent and the music very good. Changes are made three times a week in this good weather.

Through the kindness of Senator George C. Perkins, the Promotion Committee is in receipt of practically the entire edition of Mr. Newell's report on "Hawaii, Its Natural Resources and Opportunities for Home Making." The public printer, at the request of Delegate Kalaianale, is now running off one thousand copies specially ordered which will give a large number of this most valuable report for distribution.
